In 1996, India's Prime Minster V. P. Singh, an anti-corruption lawyer, launched a campaign against corruption. The campaign, known as the "Congress against Corruption" (ACC), aimed to weed out corruption and establish a culture of integrity and transparency in the country's political system. Singh's campaign was widely regarded as a significant step towards addressing the problem of corruption, which had been festering in India for many years. The campaign was supported by a broad coalition of groups, including politicians, civil society organizations, and the media. The ACC's efforts included public protests, rallies, and media campaigns aimed at raising awareness about the issue and pressing the government to take action. Singh's campaign was also supported by nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and international organizations, who provided technical assistance and resources to the ACC. The campaign's success was notable, as it led to a significant reduction in corruption and the introduction of several anti-corruption measures. Singh's commitment to fighting corruption continued throughout his tenure as Prime Minister, and his efforts were widely praised for their impact on India's political landscape. The campaign's success was reflected in its ability to mobilize large numbers of citizens, who joined the ACC's rallies and protests to demand an end to corruption. The ACC's efforts also helped to increase public awareness about the issue, leading to increased scrutiny of government officials and a greater sense of accountability. The campaign's success was also reflected in the political changes it helped to bring about, as Singh's government introduced several anti-corruption measures, including a new anti-corruption law. The ACC's campaign was not without its challenges, as it faced opposition from politicians and political parties who were accused of benefiting from corruption. Despite these challenges, the campaign's success was notable, as it helped to establish a culture of integrity and transparency in India's political system and paved the way for future anti-corruption efforts.
